“Legislative Holdouts” (with Sarah Anderson and Daniel Butler).

IPR working paper (IPR-WP-14-21)

Even though no legislator can expect to get exactly her ideal point out of the complex political process, our original survey of state legislators shows that a large number, over a quarter, indicate that they would vote against a policy that is closer to their ideal point than the status quo. Following our pre-analysis plan, we examine a number of possible factors that could explain why these legislators hold out. Our data indicate that Republicans, legislators in the majority, and those who fear that their constituents will punish compromise are most likely to hold out. Our results show one way legislative gridlock can occur even when a supermajority of legislators could be made better off by policy change.

“Passing the Buck in Congress: The Extent and Effectiveness of Blaming Others for Inaction” (with David Doherty)

The health of a democracy relies on citizens holding elected officials accountable when they fail to implement policies that serve the public. However, the separation of powers embedded in the American political system can make it difficult for citizens to make sense of who is to blame when policy solutions are not reached. Strategic politicians may take advantage of this by blaming the opposing party or those in other institutions when policies supported by the public are not enacted, harming the opposing party and institutional reputations in the process. We examine the consequences of elected officials blaming other institutions in their communications with the public. We leverage a survey experiment to examine how effective these “pass the buck” strategies are at shaping public attitudes about the individual blaming others, as well as attitudes about the group being blamed. The findings have important implications for our understanding of the extent to which the separation of powers system provides representatives with a way to avoid electoral punishment by deflecting blame, and how party and institutional reputations can be affected by this type of behavior.
