WORKS NOW IN PROGRESS

“You Can’t Always Get What You Want: How Majority-Party Agenda-Setting and Ignored Alternatives Shape Public Attitudes” (with Celia Paris)

Agenda-setting is central to the study of legislatures and has profound implications for policy outcomes, partisan legislative victories, and polarization – yet little is known about how the public reacts to agenda-setting and to majority party decisions to ignore certain policy proposals. We hypothesize that voters will be less satisfied with Congressional performance and policy decisions when they are made aware of ignored alternatives. Based on literature on procedural fairness and partisan identity, we offer competing predictions for whether all respondents or minority-party aligned respondents will be most sensitive to agenda-setting and whether the strongest negative reaction will be elicited when bipartisan alternatives or minority-party proposals are ignored. We test these hypotheses through two survey experiments focusing on two different issue areas: criminal justice reform and energy and environmental issues. Our results shed light on the relative importance of identity considerations, fairness, and policy features in shaping public support for legislation and evaluations of Congress as an institution, and suggest important implications for media coverage of Congress and democratic accountability.

“How do partisans navigate elite intra-group conflict? Party leader deviance and elite dissent as viewed from the perspective of the partisan public” (with Alexandra Filindra)

Scholars increasingly view partisanship as a social identity and find this perspective critical to understanding inter-party conflict, but extant work is much more limited in making sense of intra-party conflict. We draw on theories of partisanship as a social identity as well as psychological theories of leadership and group dynamics to theorize how partisans respond to deviant behavior by an in-group leader, and to criticism of the leader by a fellow co-partisan. We test our expectations through a series of survey experiments on both hypothetical and real leaders. The results point to in-group bias in how deviant leaders are evaluated, rallying around the leader when he is criticized, and little benefit (and sometimes punishment) for the co-partisan who criticizes the leader. This suggests that partisan group attachments can further erode democratic accountability.

(Work in progress, expected to produce a journal article)

“Are bipartisan lawmakers more effective?” (with Craig Volden and Alan E. Wiseman)

Existing work highlights the value that bipartisanship can have for Congress as a whole in enacting legislation. We examine whether this benefit applies to individual members. We analyze whether individual’s records of drawing in bipartisan support on bills they sponsor is related to the legislative effectiveness (Volden and Wiseman 2014). We also assess which legislators are able to draw in bipartisan support, including how legislators’ own efforts to join bipartisan coalitions as cosponsors pay dividends for the coalitions on their own bills.
