My work is on the theory and practice of international politics. It aims to be in conversation with other scholars, with students, and with policy-makers and the general public. My research considers how governments relate to international rules, norms, and institutions. I have written on the law of international organizations, international human rights law, international relations theory, and the practical problems of international cooperation, including the United Nations, UN reform, labor standards, the International Criminal Court, and other regimes. I am currently writing a book on law-breaking in international politics, and have other projects on human rights instruments, new kinds of diplomacy, international criminal law on torture, and methodology in international theory.
